

1. Blue Card came out on top in terms of revenue.

This could be due to a larger customer base or more frequent usage, so retaining these customers and encouraging premium upgrades could be a good opportunity.

2. Q3 was the strongest quarter, followed by a drop in Q4.

The change could be linked to seasonal spending patterns, making it worth exploring what drove the Q3 spike and using similar strategies in Q4.

3. Swipe payments contributed the most to revenue.

This shows that customers still rely heavily on physical card payments, while targeted offers could help increase adoption of online payments.

4. Bills was the biggest spending category.

Since bill payments are recurring, the bank could use cashback, rewards, and utility partnerships to encourage customers to keep using their cards.

5. Graduates were the highest-revenue education segment.

Their strong contribution may come from a larger customer base or higher spending, making them a good target for personalized offers and premium-card promotions.

Customer Report

6. Married customers contributed around 51% of total revenue.

Their higher contribution could be linked to household and recurring expenses, creating an opportunity for family-focused rewards around Bills, Grocery, and Fuel.

7. Businessmen stood out as the highest-revenue profession.

Higher spending capacity and frequent business-related expenses could be driving this, making premium business cards and tailored rewards a strong opportunity.

8. Customers aged 40–50 had the highest card ownership.

This suggests a strong and financially established customer base, so loyalty programs and premium-card upgrade offers could help increase their value further.

9. Texas, New York, and California were the top-performing states.

Their strong revenue could be driven by customer volume or higher-value spending, so these markets could be prioritized for targeted acquisition campaigns.

10. Bills remained the biggest spending category.

Because these are recurring expenses, the bank has an opportunity to turn regular bill payments into long-term customer engagement through rewards and automated-payment benefits.
